2. 2 good things: finding out new things about a city or region before even visiting it; it's pleasant since you are thinking about a future leisure activity.
3 bad things: budgeting; compromise if planning with others; planning a trip can be a long and tedious activity when you are done with the list of stuff to do and moved on to booking transports and visits in advance.
3. Best experience: casually roaming the city's tourist area.
Worst experience: Ajax supporter stole the keys of a rental bike from a friend while we were on the metro.
4. By browsing the internet to compile a list of attractions and then order them by priority, based on the price, commuting time, and the interest I have in each of them, considering time and budget constraints.
5. I walk, use bike-sharing, or rely on public transportation because it is more cost-effective than alternatives such as taxis or renting a car. Additionally, these methods are eco-friendly, require less planning, and are often faster ways of getting around.
6. By browsing the internet
7. Online or ticket office
8. Try local food. Try to find the right balance between eating cheap rubbish or more expensive proper meals based on the trip duration, the budget, the amount of daily walk I do, and the food price.
9. Other's people advice or apps like AirBnb.
10. Major role. I would improve it by allowing every service and attraction to be bookable online.
11. A friend of mine booked the hotel for the wrong week. Found out the day before. Managed to book the correct week and get a reimbursement for the wrong reservation.
12. Things to see, costs, budget, means of transportation, time.
13. It's helpful.
14. By making everything buyable online, like on a city website.
15. I would manage money according to the expected expenses, as defined in the trip plan.
